

Infidelity Why Men Cheat

Contributed by admin
Sunday, 30 July 2006

What gives rise to infidelity? There can be many reasons why men choose to cheat on their current partner. These reasons could be genetic, psychological or simply lack of interest. Let's find out why men cheat and want to leave their partner from a woman's perspective. It's a difficult fact to cope with that you have a cheating man. Women usually try to overlook certain things and think that everything is normal and under control. But once you find out that your man has been cheating on you, you should look at it from a broader perspective than merely feeling lost and hurt and doing nothing about it. Try to resolve things out by confronting your man straight forwardly and for that matter you need to know the circumstances that led him to cheat on you.

The first and foremost reason is having a chance to improve their ways by getting involved in another relationship. Women having good social standing often try to catch men who don't have a strong will power. They think that these men are emotionally weak and that their demands and desires have not been fulfilled properly. By sympathizing with these men and telling them about their goals in life, they often succeed in winning their heart. No matter how strong a relationship the man was previously in, he thinks that by getting away with this affair he can carry on with two relationships at the same time and neither of the parties will ever find out that he's been cheating. Another reason is money. Men who are constantly reminded of their duties and responsibilities often forget about their principles and start looking for ways of getting rich quick. This way they cheat on their partners and start having affairs with rich women. Most of the time they don't have any feelings involved in these kind of relationships and sooner or later they come to their senses. Sometimes it's a woman's fault to give her man a chance to cheat on her. If your man wants you to change some of your ways and habits and you don't comply, chances are he would start looking for those habits in someone else. If you don't dress up nicely, don't meet him at the door when he comes back from work and don't cook him his favorite meals, he would start discussing these things with someone outside who is close to him. In most cases these close people are women. Watch out for all your actions as well as your partner's. Men also cheat because they think it's their right to get involved in a number of relationships before finding the one who is made for them. They take it as a challenge and try to prove to the world that they can attract many women at the same time without much effort. So you see men cheat because of a variety of reasons, but what you need to know is that you shouldn't let small matters come in the way of your love. If your husband or partner is spending more and more time outside, simply ask him what he's up to. If things can get better make them so. If not, decide for your life and take the big step of leaving the man who is cheating on you but that requires a strong will power and a positive and practical way of thinking.