

Relationships

Contributed by admin
Friday, 11 July 2008

Relationships are an integral part of any human being's life. They can be of any types like relationship between parents and children, friends, lovers and many others which sometimes cannot be explained. Since, the last few centuries various phenomenons have re-defined the concept of relationships. As the world progresses people generate a lot of stress and tension into their lives and need someone to discuss it with. So, people end up loving their special ones. In today's world a relationship is only successful if it exists for a long time along with self-respect and a sense of individuality included in to it.

To be successful, marriage consultants and counselors strive on the fact of the importance of space into a relationship. In marriage, a person should act as a store house of one's requirements and desires. Both the parties should be equally committed to their association. They must take equal responsibility of their relationship as well as themselves. Never try a lot in order to persuade the other party regarding your love for him or her. Instead trust and adore yourself. This will benefit you a lot as you will get to soothe your defenses and will force you to give yourself totally in your relationship. Avoid questioning your partner about his love for you at all times. Forget the 'me first' factor when improving the connection. Never try to mix your expectations with your relationship. Try understanding yourself and then your actions to the core. Always put yourself first in any if your analysis. Think where you went wrong and not where your partner was wrong. Do not include any third person into your conflicts and put your step first for your relationship.

Nothing is a blessing like watching your children grow. Educate them, nurture them and the most important guide them for life. Teach them qualities like confidence, self-control, honesty and patience. Bring out their talents and take the initiative of praising them often. In behavioral cases punish the bad behavior not your child. Communicate with them often along with spending quality time. If you are a nuclear family then help the baby's mother in taking care of the baby.

Siblings are always seen fighting and irritating with each other. But these relationships tend to teach you a lot as having your siblings around you will teach you to adjust and live alongside others and not just you. Let the siblings convey their feelings. Never compare them with each other for their good and bad qualities. Avoid yourself for taking sides while they are at a quarrel, let them solve the matters themselves.

Your friends are your most prized possessions. They help in your life's ups and downs and never leave you alone in this cruel world. Of course people share their feelings with their parents too but there are certain topics that you prefer speaking out with your friends only. It is true that your parents understand you well enough but it is the friends only who know you to the core.